Abstract
This paper will consider the market from a topological point of view. My starting point is the contention that the market is, in its most common formulations, conceived in extrinsic and instrumental terms, and that an immanent, topological account is better suited to the task.

Drawing on the philosophy of the market propounded by Elie Ayache, along with Gilles Deleuze and Félix Guattari’s account of capitalism, I will argue that the market is best thought as two corresponding surfaces: the surface of pricing and the surface of banking.
In light of this account, I will consider the conception of money and the position of society that follows.

Bio
Jon Roffe is a Mackenzie Postdoctoral Fellow at the University of Melbourne. An editor of the journal Parrhesia, he is also the author of Badiou’s Deleuze (Acumen 2011), a book of aphorisms Muttering for the Sake of Stars (Surplius 2012) and co-editor of the forthcoming Lacan Deleuze Badiou (EUP 2013).