

Quarantine inspection: how risky a business?

Andrew Robinson, Department of Mathematics and Statistics, University of Melbourne

The application of statistical thinking to risk-assessment in the context of quarantine inspection provides a rich and satisfying set of tools for problem-solving. We develop a statistical framework for the allocation of inspection resources, and demonstrate its deployment in real-world challenges.